

COURT AND MEDICAL COMMUNITY AGREE:

Abortion is safe and medically unnecessary regulations harm women

Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt

On June 27, 2016, the Supreme Court declared in Whole Woman's Health v. Hellerstedt that women have a constitutional right to abortion and laws that impose burdens without corresponding benefits are unconstitutional. The case challenged two provisions of a Texas law designed to limit access to abortion:

- A requirement that all abortion providers obtain local hospital admitting privileges
- A requirement that abortion facilities meet hospital-like standards

In addition to failing to meet the standard defined by the Supreme Court, a new report from the National Academies of Sciences, Engineering and Medicine (NASEM) explains that these and other regulations are medically unnecessary and hurt women.

STATE REGULATIONS THAT DENY WOMEN CARE:

Regulation	What Sciences Says	Unconstitutional Per Whole Woman's Health Decision	Number of States with the Medically Unnecessary Regulation
Prohibiting nurses, nurse-midwives and physician assistants from performing abortion	These clinicians have the skills and experience to provide abortion care		34
Imposing hospital-like structural standards on facilities providing abortion care	Abortion can be performed safely in an office-based setting		17
Delaying care by imposing mandatory waiting periods	Waiting periods do not improve safety and limit a woman's options for care		26
Mandating that clinicians performing abortion have agreements with a local hospital	Requiring clinicians to have hospital privileges doesn't improve the safety or quality of care		10
Requiring patients to be in the physical presence of a physician to have a medication abortion	Medication abortion through telemedicine is a safe and effective way to access care		19

The Bottom Line:

The consensus across the medical community and the Supreme Court is that medically unnecessary abortion restrictions harm women and are unconstitutional.

To learn more about the report, visit AbortionIsSafe.com